Introduction to course

In recent years, the significance of human milk donation and banking has gained considerable attention within the fields of maternal and infant health. This value-added course is designed to provide participants with a comprehensive understanding of the essential concepts, practices, and ethical considerations surrounding human milk donation and banking. Human milk is uniquely tailored to meet the nutritional needs of infants, containing a perfect balance of proteins, fats, vitamins, and antibodies that support growth and development. It plays a crucial role in reducing the risk of infections, allergies, and chronic conditions in infants. For premature or ill infants, donor human milk can be lifesaving, offering them the best possible start in life.

TOTAL DURATION- 15 hours.

Placement of course: V Semester Batch

On completion of this course student will be able to:

- Identify and describe the key nutritional components of human milk and their specific benefits for infant growth and development.
- Evaluate ethical issues related to human milk donation, including informed consent, donor anonymity, and the implications of equitable access to donor milk.
- Develop effective community outreach strategies to promote awareness and support for human milk donation initiatives among healthcare providers and the general public.
- Demonstrate practical skills in milk collection techniques, including proper handling and storage of donor milk, through hands-on training sessions.
- Interpret and apply national and international guidelines and regulations governing human milk banking to ensure compliance and best practices.
